

remuneration in Australian and UK universities

Dr. David Foray, University of Bath, UK

Abstract: This paper examines the remuneration of senior university executives in Australia and the UK. It compares the remuneration of university executives with that of executives in other sectors, and discusses the implications for higher education. The paper also examines the role of the state in the remuneration of university executives.

Introduction

University executives are paid high salaries and bonuses, often comparable to those of executives in other sectors. This has led to criticism that university executives are overpaid and that their remuneration is not justified.

University executives are paid high salaries and bonuses, often comparable to those of executives in other sectors. This has led to criticism that university executives are overpaid and that their remuneration is not justified.

University executives are paid high salaries and bonuses, often comparable to those of executives in other sectors. This has led to criticism that university executives are overpaid and that their remuneration is not justified.

University executives are paid high salaries and bonuses, often comparable to those of executives in other sectors. This has led to criticism that university executives are overpaid and that their remuneration is not justified.